

Three old friends, Gary, Ray, and Robert, now in their early seventies, embark on a voyage of farewell to their beloved Cal 34 sailboat, owned by Gary, the Serendipity. It is a voyage of reminiscence visiting their favorite ports of call and anchorages in the San Juan Islands of Washington State and the Gulf Islands of British Columbia. Along the way, they relive and retell the experiences that made sailing together the best times of their lives. The story begins toward the end of the voyage. In twenty knot winds, a shackle gives way and the headsail starts down the slotted roller furling. Gary goes forward to secure the billowing sail. On his way back to the cockpit, a rogue wave hits and he is tossed overboard. Deja vu. Thirty-five years earlier on the maiden voyage of a 38 foot flat-decked racer-cruiser owned by Robert, a halyard had given way and the headsail had fallen to the deck, that time in gale force winds. It was Gary's first time on a sailboat. He rises to the occasion and comes forward to help Robert subdue the sail so that a third crew member can haul it back into the cockpit. Both come close to being swept overboard. Most dudes might never want to set foot on a sailboat again, but Gary is hooked and a year later buys his first sailboat, a Cal 25, which he sails twice to Alaska. The narrative then briefly chronicles Robert's sailing life with Gary and Ray up to his retirement in Tucson Estates and Gary's phone call inviting him on that last voyage. The story is told in the first person by Robert, who is a fictionalized version of the author. Much of the narrative is based on actual events, sometimes toned down, because truth can at times be more outlandish than fiction. Does the voyage end in a funeral?
